After a long time I'm feeling something is deeply missing in my life. When younger girls or those my age started getting married it didn't affect me much. But now even boys my age or younger are getting married or preparing for it and it stirs something inside I feel a longing for those moments. When I'm in a relationship with Pradee I had dreams and was preparing myself for a future with him. Then after a year things turned upside down and I pushed away those thoughts and dreams. But now it's not about Pradee or our relationship exactly it's something deeper within me questioning why I couldn't have those experiences.

Whenever these thoughts come I remember how my parents gave me the best of everything and how Pradee by being there with me and giving me his full love and attention has made my life fulfilling. He helps me move past those feelings of longing and even though I may never experience those moments with him what I have with him now is enough.

Yet, I still miss the feeling of having a child. I remember those four months with my younger brother my “thambi” who I cared for so deeply when he returned from my periamma’s home. Those months and even the ten months he was in my mother’s womb filled my heart and gave me a sense of motherhood. For every elder sister her younger brother feels like her own child but for me that’s truly real. He is a son to me especially with our nine-year age difference. I miss those moments of married life and having babies but I try to tell myself “Shalo, you have what you can in this life at least you have this in its best form.”…… And yet my heart still longs for those……..
